

If I make a school in Japan

Minoru Mukaigawa

Regardless of a child's financial situation, they should have an opportunity to study at the best schools. I'm living in the Philippines, and everyday I see a gap between rich and poor. Many children live on the streets without going to school. From my point of view, I'll outline my plans for my school in Japan.

First of all, the goal of the school is to provide education to anyone who is eager to learn. I am planning to give scholarships to 400 poor but eager to learn students. They'll be 20% of the entire student population.

Secondly, the curriculum will have a rarity of subjects like science, social studies, physical education, arts and computers. There'll be an emphasis on languages. Students will be required to study Japanese, English and a third selective language, that is Chinese, Filipino, Russian or Indian. With those language skills, students can study or work abroad in the future to enjoy their life.

Thirdly, the school will be on my island in southern Japan, connected to the mainland by a bridge that also has a monorail for easy transportation. The school will have two academic buildings, a gym, a swimming pool, a field, a cafeteria and two dormitories. There will also be a helipad and dock. The rest of the island is a forest with some gardens. It will be a nice environment for learning.

In conclusion, these're the three elements of my ideal school, Minoru International school; Scholarships, Excellent subjects and Refreshing island. In this school, I'll let all of my students be responsible global citizens who are eager to make a better world. Like B.B. King said, " Education is the one thing that no one can take from you."
